For De Moivre s precise method of investigating such propositions, and his subsequent consideration of 27 different problems, the reader is necessarily referred to the treatise itself, it being sufficient for the present occasion to merely offer, in illustration, the general tenour and results of the theory in question. The theory thus proposed, and since celebrated, as De Moivre s Hypothesis, consisted of the assumption, that any specified number of persons born would be subsequently decreased, from age to age, by some uniform number of deaths. From this it was evident, that as the number of deaths was supposed to be invariable, so such number would annually be in greater proportion to the diminishing number of survivors, and thus consistently represent, at successive ages, a yearly decrease in the probabilities of life. To render such an hypothesis capable of yielding numerical results, it became necessary to select a commencing rate of mortality. In order to apportion this, without unduly affecting the successive durations of Life, among the subsequent survivors from age to age, De Moivre sought to ascertain in how many years a number of persons cotemporaneously born might be presumed to become extinct. He accordingly referred to Dr. Halley s table, and finding, that of the 1000 persons represented at one year of age (vide p. 25), 531 attained the exemplar age of 30, and that the 531 became reduced to about one-half (262)...
