Excerpt: . . . he wept, came Sleep, the comforter. Back unto the better time, far down into the beautiful Ever blooming haunts of Hope, the wizard Slumber bore him. In the village street he played among his old companions, But unto him, even then, a sorrow came and smote him--Came and smote him, as the first fair flowers of spring are smitten By the frost-winds of a world in which they wake too early; For, while in the street he played among his dear companions, From his heart the bird named Joy, that had its nest within it, In a fearful flight flew forth. For from his fathers cottage Came a crowd of people, clad in garments black and gloomy, Bearing down the village lane toward him a white sleeper; Bearing by him where he stood the corpse of his dear mother! Sadly by her grave he...
