Excerpt: . which we choose that the strength of our cause should rest. In every kind of public speaking it is import tant to hit the precise time of concluding, so as to bring the discourse just to a point; nei-i ther ending abruptly and unexpectedly, nor disappointing the expectation of the hearers, when they look for the discourse being finished. The close should always be concluded with dignity and spirit, that the minds of the hearers may be left warm, and that they may depart with a favourable impression of the subject and of the speaker. Having thus adjusted and prepared the several parts of a subject, the next object is the style in which we are to convey it to others. This has been so elaborately and accurately treated by Dr. Blair, that I shall take the same liberty which others. have done,...
